

Weather Forecast #1

Tape script [sic]

BBC Radio 4

It's gonna be a dry day across that part of England. In fact it's a dry day across all of England and up into Wales; and that's where I was going to start the forecast.

Now it is a quite (a) chilly morning. You might have to scrape your windscreen and there could be a fog patch around. But as I said, it'll be a sunny and dry day for most of us. Some cloudier skies this afternoon [is] moving in across southwest England, Wales and the north of England. And that cloud [is] rolling in on a freshening wind; and that southerly wind could be touching gale¹ force through the Irish Sea by this evening. Temperatures today are around 15 in London and Cardiff, closer to 13 or 14 in Liverpool and Newcastle.

Up into Scotland next and it's gonna be [a] sunny morning on the eastern side of Scotland; and, despite the cloud coming in during the afternoon, it should stay dry there. That's in contrast to the west where it'll cloud over but will turn wet and windy. Perhaps even some gales coming on. The first of the rain [comes] by around about midday into the Hebrides and then [they will be] edging eastwards through the afternoon. The temperature in Glasgow [will be] 11 or 12 Celsius, whereas in Aberdeen 13 or 14 degrees today.

And across in Northern Ireland [there is] a bright start, but cloud will quickly spill from the west. [There will be] strengthening wind, a few bits of showery rain this morning. [There will be] wetter, windier weather this afternoon, perhaps even severe gales for the North Channel by this evening; and the temperature of 14 in Belfast. And that's the weather.

¹ gale

1. A very strong wind.
2. Meteorology. a. Any of four winds with speeds of from 32 to 63 miles (51 to 102 kilometers) per hour, according to the Beaufort scale. b. A fresh gale.
3. A forceful outburst: gales of laughter.
